Im aware that there is some argument about what constitutes a burial ground. Mr. Chairman, I submit that a person whos bur-ied anywhere, as far as Im concerned, is sacred ground. We do know many of those that perished in Martins Cove were placed in blankets and covered with snow because the ground was so frozen graves could not be dug. Does this make the ground less significant or less sacred I do not think so. From the perspective of any thoughtful person, Mr. Chairman, Martins Cove is a burial site, in religious and historical significance. Despite its historical significance, the Federal Government did little for public access to the site. My understanding that no access, highway notifications or facilities were available to the public until the LDS Church, in cooperation with the Sun family, purchased a fee simple land adjoining Martins Cove in 1996...
